

1. Toluna

Toluna is pretty much the best site for getting free products and rewards in exchange for your views. Simply create a free account then you can choose to start testing products or select various polls to answer.

2. UserTesting

UserTesting is awesome because it lets you test websites for money. Although you won't be testing physical products, it's really fun, pays well and the range of sites you get to test keeps you entertained.

3. Alba Science

As the name might suggest, Alba Science will typically send you cosmetics to test. The products they send are often pretty high quality, so if you have expensive taste, this could be one worth signing up for!

4. Pinecone

Pinecone is an excellent and well trusted survey and product testing site, and one of the best paying too.

5. Clicks Research

What's more, aside from testing products, you can also complete surveys to earn Click Points. Once you've earned 2,500 points, you'll earn £25, and as each survey pays between 25–200 points, this could amount to anything between 12 and 100 surveys.

6. i-Say

i-Say is one of the UK's leading market research companies, and they're more than happy to reward you for your opinions.

7. Crowdvilla

Crowdvilla is the new kid on the product testing block – in the UK, at least. They're already well-established in Italy, and have a unique spin on product testing: apps. If you love discovering the latest and greatest smartphone apps, you should definitely consider getting paid for it.

8. BzzAgent

BzzAgent is quite a good company. You can get all sorts from toiletries to food to gadgets etc. They send you products to keep in exchange for small things – for example an honest review, or a post on Instagram or Twitter about it.
